THE REVOLUTIONARY DRAMA

Although the more recent messages that come from Russia entirely lack that vivid and sensational interest which so suddenly burst upon us, they are certainly extensive and peculiar and curiously interesting. At St. Petersburg, we are told in our telegrams to-day, a general resumption of the strike is expected to take place on Sunday next. The storm seems to be dying down in Warsaw where, another telegram says all, the hospitals are full. There the insurrection took the same form and the same course as in the capital. The forces behind it may not have been exactly the same, and the causes and claims may have been to some extent different. But the outbreak was coincident with, all the other outbreaks not only in the time chosen for it. It was the outward and substantial expression, long delayed and perhaps even now premature, of the vague though bitter dissatisfaction which has for years and decades been sapping the foundations of government in Russia. It is more difficult than ever to forecast the immediate future, though there cannot be much reasonable doubt of what the ultimate result of these terrible doings must be. Evidently there have been horrors in Poland. The official casualty lists are big enough, and even the abated vigour of newspaper correspondence lets us know that the official figures are wildly below the mark. Of course in Poland the riots were part of the national movement that has never been stilled, and the same is true of Finland. But in that national movement has been working the added poison of the feelings that underlay the rising in St. Petersburg, and here, as elsewhere throughout the whole country, the riots were and are, we shall continue to believe, the beginning of the Revolution. There is no difficulty in understanding the reasons for initial failure. Firstly, there is the unexpected loyalty and discipline of the troops, and secondly the inefficiency of the revolutionary organisation. Either this organisation is by no means so powerful as was believed or, as is more probable, it was taken as much by surprise as was the bureaucracy, and has, moreover, been hampered by internal jealousies. Thus it is easily conceivable that those who have been responsible for the Polish and Finnish insurrections have declined to interest themselves in the St. Petersburg development, acting by and for themselves and their own countries, and that for the time labour and education cannot be gathered into one revolutionary camp.

But the Revolution need be no less sure because it is somewhat slow. Its precedent in France was four years in the making and, though the differences are so marked that the one is no guide to the other, it began in much the same way. No doubt the Government hope to secure themselves for a time, and perhaps for ever, by driving a wedge between the people and their natural leaders. But the new movement is irresistible and must gather new force with time. And behind all this are the possibilities hidden in the upshot of events in Manchuria, which complicates the whole situation and can only be a deadly menace to the present reactionary and incompetent Government.
