A BALLAD OF EGYPT.

THE LADY WAHIEDA.

By BARONNET DE MALOTTE.

Eight years had flown and then the trouble

(came)

The spring began to fall 'twas less and less,

There is you know but very little rain.

So without water nothing but distress.

The fellah saw the fields on which he toiled

Showing no life, but hardening into dust.

His many skilled devices were now failed,

Old men were grim, the women's voices

(hoarse)

Poor children sat like woe-bills in a row

Over the withered ruminant, mute and crushed.

Feeding on shrivel'd dates which are so, so,

No filling in odd corners with a crust;

When lo! a holy man upon his way

To Mecca, spread his mat and knelt to pray.

Two days and nights he did not even drink,

And so the weary people gathered round.

The elders looked, and then began to think

Perhaps the saintly one would bless the (ground)

They begged him thus, but he remained at

(dumb)

With lifted eye-balls gazing into space.

They fasted, too, until the time should come,

All time was Allah's—patience, then, was

(haste)

On the third eve, he spoke as one awakes,

Where is the woman, mother of the son

Who has five brothers? even for her sake,

The thing you pray for, surely shall be done

But I must speak with her—the shall not raise

Heaven's own reward, which afterwards is

(bliss)

They all withdrew and whisper'd, who is she?

They knew each other every one by name,

We fear it is a riddle—Tant! tant! tant!

But we must find the answer all the same,

Ah, now said one, I'll ask my lord Murad,

He is much older since the great Sir's death,

I think the younger one may have a tale

(smack)

The humble folk talk not about the great.

They rarely look at them, as they pass by

But it all simply—er, in greater state,

Why hazard thus to meet the evil eye?

(smack)

There have been Pashas, Allah give them

(smack)

That brought much sorrow to the fellah race.

Murad had fed and smoked, so in his mood

A suppliant—was better than a joke,

Quite slowly he absorbed his mental food.

Then like an oracle at last he spoke.

Go back, said he, and tell the holy man

I think I know the lady—if he lies

And if I find his promise is a sham

Or but a play of words—why then he dies!

Forthwith beneath the lofty portals he

Strode on, a black ambassador, in fact.

The slaves in order all stood to his feet.

And wondered at his diplomatic tact—

They heard of suffering, they too might feel,

So one, then all before Wahida kneel.

(To be continued).

L'EGYPTE, INSPIRATRICE
DES POETES

M. PAUL PLAN

L'Egypte a joué dans l'antiquité le premier rôle dans la littérature et dans les sciences. La richesse de son sol, la douceur de son climat, la beauté enchanteuse de ses paysages lui rendent tout au long sa splendeur d'autrefois. Les peintres et les poètes, aussi bien que les littérateurs, peuvent y puiser de magnifiques sujets d'inspiration.

C'est d'ailleurs ce que les hommes de lettres semblent comprendre de plus en plus. Tout dernièrement encore M. Paul Plan, qui a publié pour ses débuts "Roses de la Vie", n'a pas hésité à quitter ses occupations artistiques à Paris pour faire une tournée en Egypte, en compagnie de la troupe de comédie française, dont il est en même temps le premier rôle. Déjà plusieurs poètes exclusivement locaux ont jailli de sa plume; quelques-uns d'entre eux ont même été publiés, par nos confrères, mais la plupart de ses sujets ne sont qu'ébauchés, ce sont des idées jetées au hasard sur le papier et qu'il développera plus tard à loisir.

M. Paul Plan a fait partie du Portique à Marseille avec Jean Lombard, Cloris Hugues et tant d'autres. C'est sur le conseil de l'ami Coppée, président d'honneur de cette société littéraire, qu'il vint à Paris où il entra au conservatoire et embrassa la carrière dramatique. Il n'abandonna pas pour cela la littérature. Au contraire. A l'époque de la guerre des Boers, il déclara au cercle militaire "un épisode de guerre au Transvaal" qui obtint un immense succès. Encouragé par cet accueil, il résolut de réunir ses poésies éparées en un volume "Roses de la Vie" qu'il publia. Les éloges les plus flatteurs parvinrent à l'auteur
